Company Report Service

A researcher may want to study the particular company of men with whom an ancestor served. Companies were usually composed of 100 men and may have come in whole or in part from specific geographic regions. Companies were led by an officer called a captain; other officers in a company were lieutenants, sergeants and corporals. Sometimes, the military records of officers are helpful in supplementing the record of a single soldier.

Companies of men were organized into regiments or battalions, which were in turn arranged in brigades, then into corps and finally into armies. Reading about each of these levels of organization in general reference works is helpful to a researcher.

As a service, Arkansas Research will search the database of Arkansas Confederate soldiers for a particular company of men and print a report listing the men in the company with their names, ranks, and cross reference information.

Of what use is this company report? Since some companies were geographically specific, it may be possible to locate the pre-war residence of a soldier by using the company report in conjunction with census, land and tax records. When pensions for Confederate service were granted, one form of proof of service was the testimony of comrades-in-arms. Therefore, while an ancestor of interest may never have applied personally for a pension, he may have given testimony and signed a former comrade's application. Another compelling reason to learn the names of an ancestor's fellow soldiers is to use those names to locate additional records. Manuscript collections may contain diaries and letters of soldiers perhaps mentioning the ancestor, or, at the least, giving information about events in service.

To obtain a company report, write Arkansas Research and give: the soldier's full name, his unit and company. Enclose a $10 report fee. Arkansas Research cannot furnish a company report on the basis of a soldier's name alone because so many men of the same or similar names exist in the records. The researchers must determine the particular soldier and identify him by unit and company.
